The James Wheeler House, 32 Hickory Ave., faces east on a rise over the street across from the Main Branch of the Harford County Library and the Bel Air Town Hall. An immaculate example of Bel Air's clapboard bungalows and one of the largest and latest, the house, built in 1943, is the ultimate extension of that popular style.

On the 1930 Sandborn Map this whole block of Hickory was vacant except for a chicken farm at this end (the south). There was nothing but farm land across the street where the Bel Air Town Hall and the Public Library now stand. Contractor Harry Orsburn acquired the block when he purchased a $2000 mortgage assignment. He subdivided it, and it seems reasonable to suppose he built the houses. The house was built in 1943 for James Wheeler, the father of Ed Wheeler, who owned the lumber yard on West Broadway behind the Presbyterian Manse. (It was formerly Bull and Culp's and later became Kefauver's.) The younger Wheeler also owned the house at 26 West Broadway [HA-1787].

The James Wheeler House, 32 Hickory Ave., faces east on a rise over the street across from the Main Branch of the Harford County Library and the Bel Air Town Hall. An immaculate example of Bel Air's clapboard bungalows and one of the largest and latest, the house, built in 1943, is the ultimate extension of that popular style.

Everything about it is spacious, from its shed dormers to its light and airy interior. The corner porch is unusual, as is the fact that this is a two family dwelling. The ground floor has living room, dining room, kitchen, 2 bedrooms and a bath. Upstairs there is an apartment with living room, 2 bedrooms, kitchen, and bath, plus another bedroom that is connected to the ground floor. A lot of room for one bungalow.

The 3 bay house has large shed-roofed dormers front and rear (east and west) with 2 windows in front and 4 in back, the middle bay being occupied by double windows rather than single, all of which are 6/6 double-hung sash. The extension of the gable roof covers a porch with a square post and balustrade in the south bay and a (bed)room in the north. Front ground floor windows are double. Entry in the middle bay is directly into the living room. Similar shed-roofed structures on the side (north and south) elevations are (south) a large bay with 3 pairs of windows that constitutes a small room off the dining room and (north) the entrance to the apartment. A small porch on the rear has an almost flat roof carried on square posts linked by a balustrade with square balusters. The downstairs woodwork has a slight profile on the outer edge. Neither the bedrooms on the first floor or the upstairs were visited.

The present owners are only the second, and Mr. Reed carries on, in a small way, the chicken farm tradition: he has a rooster that is well known in that part of town, and he used to raise Banty hens.

The only alteration has been the enlargement of the kitchen by enclosing a porch to the north and adding the present small porch.

The second floor apartment was apparently original.
